THE LITTLE SHOE.

I turn the key of this old drawer,

Another's pulse may not be moved At such a faded thing; A burning to another heart This relic might not bring.

A haby's little shoe!

I cannot on it coldly gaze, As other eyes might view, Decause dead years draw hither with This little baby sace. It wakes again a childish voice

And little footfalls on the floor And patterings on the stafe, A mother's ever-deepening love,

A father's yearning, too, Are firmly knotted in the string Of this blue little shoo. The paths for those small feet prepared They stretched away in cals Alas for-hopes that sailty failed. Publishment to attain:

THEIR MAY MOVING.

Why Mrs. Peregrine Post Thinks Her Cousin Very Generous.

It was the thirtieth day of April when my cousin, Peregrine Post, came into the office, threadline and shaliby as usual, with the nap worn off his hat, his garments threadbare with much wear and excessive brushing and a pair of fingerless gloves upon his hands. I cannot say that I was glad to see hlm. My constn Peregrine Post was one of those luckless fellows who are always losing property, making unfortunate investments and borrowing small sums of money, which are to be repuld without fail at the expiration of precisely one week from the date of the loan. But he was a good sort of fellow, too, in his way. The had made a love match with a pretty blue-cycl girl without a penny and had half a lozen dimpled babies, and how they lived nobody knew.

"Going to move this first of May, Cousin Jacob?" said he, beamingly.

"I suppose so," said L "So am L" said Consin Peregrino. "Rent's getting too high-landlady has raised-all that sort of thing. So we're going to No. 11 Smith street."

I looked hard at Peregrine Post and made no remark. Was he going to ask me to lend him five dollars, or to demand that lishould become security for his rent? I resolved in my immost mind to say "No" to either proposition do you think I've nothing to do but to one furniture to give away?"

"Any old thing, you know," interposed my cousin, with imperturbable good-hunner. "We aren't particular." "I shall alo nothing of the sort," said "I have no 'old things.' My furniture is all substantial and excellent -" "Wish mine was!" interjected Peregrine Post, rubbing the palms of his fingerless gloves together briskly. "And I do not propose to part with it. So I wish you a very good morning." "Noroffense, I hope," said Peregrine

"Good morning," I repeated, frigidly and just then my clerk come in to tell me that the cariman was rathing outside for orders as to the moving over mornial of the morrow. I went home after business hours and

"Furniture does accumulate so when one has been keeping house a long time; and 1 do feel so sorry for that poor little Nelly Post, with her flock of bables." "I don't," I resolutely asserted. "As people make their bed, so they must lie on it. And I've no patience at all with Peregrine Post."

"He has had very bad luck through life, dear," pleaded my wife. "Your pathihas been in the sunshine; his has lainfin the shadow. We ought not to be hard upon each other in this world, Jacob.

"That's all, nonsense," said I, stoutly. But I won't deny that my conscience did prick and sting me a little when I looked around at my own piles of stuffed easy chairs, Brussels curpets and springy chintz lounges neatly pucked for the morrow's transportation, and thought of poor Peregrine Post and, his blue-eyed wife and the six little Posts, with their humble plea for a few sticks of cast off furniture. The morrow came-the cruel first of May, with its raw winds, tornadoes of dust and the inevitable showers which come down as if by malice prepense just as the mattresses and the silken sofas are piled;on the top of the load, I was compelled to be at my office, but my wife was to be at the new house to receive the forniture, while Bridget, our ancient and reliable housekeeper, dispatched it from the deserted do-strength for something else; the woman who is weak will feel that she is strong. It isn't the woman that does the work-it's PEARLINE.

So it is with the clothes. They needn't be strong. The finest things fare as well as the coarsest. They all last longer, for they're saved the rubbing that wears them out. Work was never so easy-never so well done. And safe, too. Nothing that is washable was ever hurt by Pearline. If it were otherwise-do you think we would continue to sell enough Pearline yearly to supply every family in the land with several packages.

"Did you tell him where to drive?" I asked. "Sure, he had a bit of a caird that you wrote yoursilf," said Bridget. I tore my hair. Who ever heard of a load of furniture getting lost in the streets of the metropolis like a blackand-tan terrier or a barefooted baby? "What on earth does this mean?" I demanded, apostrophizing the disman-tled windows, the fireless grate, rather than any actual personality. At that moment Mrs. Goldleaf came hurriedly in.

Pergrine Post's blue-eyed little wife. "Dear, dear Cousin Jacob," she cried, running up to me in tears, "I must thank you with my own lips." "Thank me.' For what?" I demand ed, wondering if trouble and impecuniosity and an overplus of babies had driven the little creature mad. "I could hardly believe my own eyes, said she, breathlessly. "And I'm se sorry I called you a hardhearted flint last night, when Peregrine came home and told me how coldly you had reputsed him. How was I to know that delightful surprise?" I turned to my wife. "Speak to her, Alice," said I, in a whisper. "Do contrive somehow to sooth her. I'm very much afraid she's

Mrs. Goldleaf, who had always been partial to my Consin Peregrine's wife, went up to her with outstretched bands "Tell me about it, dear," said she.

This, then, explained the mystery, In my angry preoccupation of the day before I had written the address of the house which my cousin Peregrine Post had told me he was about to move into, instead of my own.

My wife looked at me with sparkling eyes of love and admiration. "Dear Jacob," said she, "I knew-I knew you could be noble and magnanimous when you chose."

"Oh, how-how can I ever thank you sufficiently?" sobbed Nelly, covering my hand with kisses. I said nothing. What could I say? To this day the Posts believe that I had a spontaneous burst of generosity on that first day of May. But I had to explain matters to my wife, and I checked the career of the cartman at once. "Never mind, dear," said Mrs. Goldleaf. "We can buy new furniture. And your consin, Peregrine Post, needs it so much, and Nelly was so grateful." And that was all the corsolation I

How He Duped the Butcher and Swindled Ills Master. A correspondent sends from Michigan a true story of a farmer's dog who has been found guilty of obtaining goods under false pretenses.

He is extremely fond of sausages, and has been taught by his owner to go after them for himself, earrying a written order in his mouth.

Day after day he appeared at the butcher's shop, bringing his master's order, and by and by the butcher became careless about reading the document. Finally, when settlement day came, the farmer complained that he was charged with more sausages than he had ordered.

The butcher was surprised, and the next time Lion came in with a slip of paper between his teeth he took the trouble to look at it. The paper was blank, and further, investigations showed that whenever the dog felt a eraving for sausage he looked around for a piece of paper and trotted off to the butcher's.

The farmer is something out of pocket, but squares the account by beasting of his dog's intelligence.-N. Y. Journal.

DR. G. C. OSGOOD,

"Castoria is the best remedy for children of which I am acquainted. I hope the day is not far distant when mothers will consider the real interest of their children, and use Castoria instead of the various quack nostrums which are destroying their loved ones, by foreing opium, morphine, soothing syrup and other hurtful agents down their throats, thereby sending them to premature graves."
